In 2008, researchers from the University of Liverpool and the University of Copenhagen found a whopping 1,200-year-old latex sap in a coconut from the site. It's made up of saponin, a compound present in plants that can be used as a thickening agent. It's not the first saponin sap that has been found at an ancient Mayan site. In 2003, researchers from the University of Arizona and the University of California, Davis, found saponin in a structure in Belize, as well. However, it was a much smaller amount, and its presence was only attested to through carbon-dating. The University of Liverpool team has also found evidence that saponin was used in embalming or as medicine at Kukulkan Temple, a major temple at the site. Researchers found fragments of shells and seeds from plants in the Caribbean region that contain saponins. An ancient pot found in the same area was also found to contain saponin. "It was very exciting to find the unique structure of latex in the coconut," said Mike Bates, co-author of the paper, in a statement. "It's a major discovery, especially given that this structure had not previously been observed in any other tropical tree 2d92ce491b
