With the growing popularity of the Internet and the growth of web sites, a large number of on-line businesses have emerged. For example, on-line businesses can be found for almost any product or service. Some on-line businesses are merely storefronts where a user can purchase goods and services. Some on-line businesses are search engines that allow a user to enter a keyword or two that will return a list of web sites that offer the items listed on those web sites. Some on-line businesses are classified advertisements. Others allow a user to place an advertisement on their web site. On-line businesses have been found to be very successful, at least in the short term. In the case of a search engine, a user can perform a search, enter the search criteria, and receive a list of search results. Some search engines rank the search results by page rank. Some search engines rank the search results by the number of other users that have performed a search for the same or a similar set of keywords and received a search result that matches the user's search criteria. Although on-line businesses are becoming more prevalent, existing business methods still rely on face-to-face sales. For example, a customer is often told to call a toll-free number or visit a physical store to buy a product. A similar scenario takes place in the case of a classified advertisement. An advertisement in a newspaper or a magazine may be read by potential customers and calls made to potential customers. One problem with existing methods for attracting new customers is that the customer is required to take the initiative. For example, the customer is required to read an advertisement, find the store or toll-free number, call the toll-free number, or call the store. This problem is more apparent where the customer is required to interact with the on-line business. For example, in the case of search engines, the search engine may present the user with a list of search results. Although the search results may include websites that sell particular items, the search results typically do not display any information concerning how to contact the on-line business. The
