The Australian Child Care Standard, introduced in 2007, has become the benchmark for child care in the country. The New South Wales government is facing a court challenge to its validity. Key points: The Australian Child Care Standard, known as the ABCS, was introduced in 2007. It provides a minimum standard of care for children in care. A government report found the "ABCS is having a positive impact". It sets minimum standards of care that must be provided by government-funded providers of care, such as kindergartens and child-care centres. The ABCS applies to all children and provides a minimum standard of care, regardless of age or educational achievement. The standard was introduced by the former Labor government and updated and strengthened by the current government. The ABCS includes information and activities that are proven to be effective in child care, such as speech and language therapy, occupational therapy and children's play. Minister for Early Childhood, Professor Yvette D'Ath, announced the release of a government report into the effectiveness of the ABCS in July. But care providers in the Latrobe region are questioning whether the ABCS is the best way to care for children and whether it is in the best interest of children. The Royal Australian College of Paediatrics and Child Health (RACPC) said the ABCS did not help children. The Latrobe Regional Council, which is challenging the ABCS, is part of the RACPC. Its spokeswoman, Leanne Hardy, said: "Latrobe Regional Council is prepared to bring this matter to the Court of Appeal, where we have a strong case." The council argued the ABCS did not support families and did not meet the needs of children in care. A spokesman for the Education Minister, Rob Stokes, said the ABCS was the best way to care for children. "There's no question that children in care have special needs and require a higher level of care than any other child," he said.
