The intestinal crypt is a highly ordered, yet extremely complex, organ comprising different types of cell-to-cell junctions and signaling molecules. Despite the vital role of the intestinal crypt in maintaining homeostasis of the intestinal environment, direct studies on the crypt dynamics in a live state in a physiologically relevant environment are hindered by the difficulty in distinguishing crypt-specific events from those occurring in other regions of the intestinal epithelium. Herein, we present a new set of fluorescent single-molecule fluorescent probes that specifically target cell-to-cell junctions and signaling molecules expressed in the crypts of the small intestine. This set of probes, in addition to exhibiting high brightness and photostability, can be tracked in vivo with single-molecule sensitivity to depict dynamic subcellular processes, such as cell-to-cell junction remodeling, cell polarization, and cell motility. We used the newly developed technique to study in vivo intestinal crypt dynamics with single-molecule resolution in live animals. Our study is a step forward in the application of single-molecule imaging techniques to the living intestine and shows promise in its application for direct dynamic observation of crypt dynamics in the living animal.Q: Sharing the same datasource between multiple Datagridview? I have two Datagridviews on my form with three columns. I want both of them to have the same datasource. I also want to keep both of them synchronized. In other words, if I change something in the datasource (or the datasource is updated) it will appear in both the gridviews. How can I accomplish this? A: you'll have to create a class that implements this: public class DataSourceAdapter : IDataAdapter { public int Fill(DataSet ds) {
