The definitions below come from the Autism Aspergers Society of America (AASA) definition of Autism. Autism is a complex, usually lifelong, brain-based neurodevelopmental disorder characterized by social and communication impairments, and by restricted and repetitive behaviors, interests, and activities. Autism spectrum disorders are autism or autistic disorder. Autism: there is a core set of deficits associated with autism, which may include impaired social skills, lack of interest in the surroundings, intense focus on a narrow or repetitive area, severe problems with language, unusual responses to sensory experiences, and sensory hypersensitivity. Autistic disorder: a person has autistic disorder if s/he meets all of the criteria for autism and further meets criteria for pervasive developmental disorders, including Asperger's disorder. The Asperger's Syndrome is a mild form of autism, though with some autistic traits. The Autism Spectrum Disorders (ASD) is comprised of two main groups of disorders that are quite distinct from each other, autism and Asperger's Syndrome. Autism Spectrum Disorders include individuals with As 2d92ce491b
