The problem is, the mail server often blocks connection from IPs that it does not know, even though the IP is clearly within the user's network. I have a DNS based solution (set outgoing email server to a specific IP and user, rather than mail server) but I would like to be able to make it configurable to use a mail server. My initial thoughts is to have a list of IP addresses configured in app.config. Is there a better solution? A: Here is a great post on how to test with your SMTP server and see how it handles incoming connections. If your mail server blocks incoming connections, your connections will fail, you'll get a 503 error back, or it could bounce your email. I would recommend setting up a test SMTP server at least locally on your development machine to help you troubleshoot. In your web application, have a try/catch somewhere that handles the connection errors. Testing for your server: SMTP Server Settings (client) SMTP Server (server) By default, when trying to send an email, it will test the server settings (to see if it is compatible with your server). If you are using the default settings, you'll get a 201 response back, which means that your server is successful. If you're not, you'll get a error code back. You can use this to detect ba244e880a
