Q: what is an effective way to ensure a user saves his data? I am building a data warehouse which will be used by various applications. I have a question that I'd like to ask you guys to help me with. I am using SQL Server 2008 and VMWare ESXi for development. Whenever I want to develop an application, I prefer to have SQL Server 2008 up and running in my local machine. When I am done with an application, it is difficult for me to connect to the remote SQL Server directly because of my client configuration. So I am planning to build a local standalone version of SQL Server and run the application on my local desktop machine. The local database is locked, all tables are in memory, and the stored procedures should be synchronized with remote SQL Server. Is there any way I can write a script so that the data I input in the local database is automatically synchronized with the remote SQL Server, if I quit the application? Thanks. A: This sounds like you would like your database to be automatically backed up when the database server is shut down. The best way to do this is to have it automatically backed up by creating database snapshots during application run time. These snapshots are completely reversible - no matter what happens, you can always rollback to them by rebooting the SQL Server service and restoring the database from those snapshots. These snapshots are made from "continuous capture" databases, this means that the database is being backed up by the SQL Server service whether you are running the database or not.
