The development of retinal disease caused by photic trauma is dependent on the expression of biochemical and morphological changes within the retina that result in damage to the photoreceptors. The most significant photoreceptor cell damage results from the production of reactive oxygen species within the photoreceptor cell. This insult triggers apoptosis, which begins with translocation of pro-apoptotic Bax, from its cytoplasmic compartment to the mitochondrial membrane. Bax, in turn, triggers the release of cytochrome c from the mitochondria and initiates the caspase cascade. The production of reactive oxygen species also leads to oxidative stress within the retinal cell. The results of such cellular stress can be measured by assessing the levels of oxidized glutathione. The potential neuroprotective effects of trolox, a lipid-soluble analogue of vitamin E, and edaravone, a selective naphthyl-phenyl-isopropyl-amine (NBI-74330) derivative, were compared in a light-induced nuclear cataract model in the rat. NBI-74330 was also administered intraperitoneally (50 mg/kg body weight) to compare its neuroprotective effectiveness with that of the vehicle control. Treatment with trolox and NBI-74330 reduced the cataractous changes induced by a single-dose light exposure, particularly in animals with additional treatment with edaravone. The reduction in nuclear cataract formation was a result of decreasing Bax translocation to the mitochondria and attenuating the caspase cascade. The antioxidant properties of trolox and NBI-74330 appear to protect the retina from photooxidative damage by inhibiting apoptosis. Anniversary I know, I know, time passes and years change, and I don't want to get married again. Some people see marriage as a set of obligations, which I don't, or choose not to, have. And I am pretty damn happy, and content and not by some of my dear female friends who find themselves trapped in the hell of an institution. I am on a path to be more independent, live in my home, not a neighbor's house, have all my
