Å Best Gaming PC. Q: Need some assistance choosing a stringed instrument I have recently started playing the violin, and have found that my currently available instrument is insufficient for what I want to do. I cannot afford to add any more expensive stringed instruments to my current set, so I am looking for recommendations for other stringed instruments I could feasibly buy for under $200. The kinds of styles of music I like include classical, indie rock, folk rock, and some jazz/rock fusion. I also enjoy playing traditional Korean instruments such as the gayageum, the pansori and the datar. Since the viola is more affordable, I'm looking into that instrument. However, it's not entirely clear to me how the violin sounds, and I don't know how the violinist prepares for the various ranges of music I am interested in. If I picked up the violin and then started learning, the main question I have is: are there any violinists that are near my level, and how would I approach learning violin in the same way I approached the violin now? Any other suggestions are also welcome. A: The violin sounds much like a cello. There are many resonating chamber-like boxes to amplify the sound. Because it is a viol, most normal violinists would play and/or play for a larger instrument than the violin. You may find a violinist to take lessons with you to get your playing prepared for the viola, or you may find a violist to take lessons for the violin to prepare for the cello. Your choice is not uncommon for playing a string instrument. For example, many violin players consider the double bass to be a good upper register instrument, even though the "low" end (usually around Eb6) is not a recognizable instrument for most violinists. The violin is probably the most versatile instrument in the world, making it very helpful in such things as studio work, when you would not want to play an instrument that is loud and resonate. (There is no such thing as a good violinist.) It is great for jazz and rock when the chords are hidden. However, playing the violin is not without challenges. The violin is one of the most difficult string instruments to play. It is one of the hardest instruments to learn. The difficulty begins from the fact that

This laptop can connect to the internet as well and runs some services that can access the internet (ie: google.com, facebook, etc) - this is what I want to block. The laptop can also access internal resources, so we don't need to restrict access to this computer. I don't want to turn off the VPN, because the company's network is for internal usage only. The VPN is Microsoft PPTP with a self-signed certificate. How can I configure the firewall to allow all traffic in from and out, except for a specific host (laptop) and port (port 443)? A: You could use Network Address Translation (NAT) with a Proxy-Server with a rule in it that you specify a host and port. And if you are using a firewall software like Windows Firewall you can use Network-Rules in there. For the VPN-connectivity have a look at this.
