Ameloblastomas of the gingiva are rare tumors. Herein we describe a case of ameloblastoma occurring in the gingiva of a 72-year-old female, and also review the literature. The tumor showed osteoid production and adjacent bone trabeculae. The postoperative histopathological diagnosis was ameloblastoma with osteosarcomatous transformation. The histological differential diagnosis of ameloblastoma with osteosarcomatous transformation includes exuberant reactive bone formation such as pyogenic granuloma, giant cell granuloma, and cherubism, which must be differentiated from metastatic osteosarcoma. The brain and the metaphor: implications for psychiatric nursing. As psychiatric nurses, we are expected to have knowledge of brain anatomy and brain physiology, as well as knowledge of cognitive and emotional processes. As the first level of processing in the brain is biological, the brain provides a rational, underlying explanation for the process of psychiatric diagnosis and treatment. If the brain is to be the model for explanation, it follows that its organization of structure and processes is the biological basis for all mental processes. The rational brain is the origin of the symbolic brain, and the symbolic brain is the source for language, art, literature, music, religion, and spirituality. It would then follow, that in order to comprehend the complexity of psychiatric problems, we must first understand the biological basis for psychiatric phenomena. When we treat all symptoms through a biological model, we prevent the development of effective psychotherapies. We then limit the processes of our patients to biological-mechanistic metaphors. The implication is that the treatment of patients with psychiatric problems must be based on a biopsychosocial model that comprehends the importance of the social, family, and psychological factors and the relationship of these factors to the brain and to the theory of mind.
