My boyfriend, Derrick, had to take his yellow lab, Hunter, for a check-up today and he is a mouth breather. We noticed it on our way home from the vet's and then we fell asleep while watching some TV and woke up to Hunter's snoring. This just bothered me and I started to be concerned and thinking about how much money it was going to cost to put up with him. So, Derrick and I decided to call the vet we've been using the whole time we have been together. I had never been to the vet for him before and we were nervous. We didn't really know what we were going to get done or what the costs would be and what the outcome was going to be. We had a vet appointment scheduled and decided it would be good to ask if there were any other options out there. So, a few days before the appointment, we started doing research on the Internet. A lot of doctors will refer to a holistic vet when you have a problem like Hunter had. The problem is, I had to look for that information. After finding a list of holistic vets in our area, I started calling to inquire about appointments. I was put on hold twice on the phone with the vets and was told by each time that they could not make appointments for us the next week because they were busy with other patients. In a panic, we decided to go ahead and book an appointment. The vet we selected was six hours away, so we knew we would have to get in early and get it over with. While we were waiting for the appointment, we googled any information we could find on mouth breathers. It turns out that we were fortunate in that Hunter was not a mouth breather. It has also been proven that if your dog is an overweight when they are young, they tend to become mouth breathers as they get older.
