Previous guinea pig models of acute ethanol intoxication have involved exposure to high concentrations of ethanol for short periods of time. In contrast, human ethanol intoxication involves a gradual, continuous absorption of ethanol over time. The purpose of this project is to study the potential for environmental covariates (e.g. temperature) to effect the blood ethanol level. The initial specific aims are to determine the effects of temperature, exercise, and time of day on the blood ethanol concentration following ethanol ingestion in humans. The initial experiments will be performed to determine if blood ethanol changes over time and if exercise is correlated with higher blood ethanol levels. The relationship between exercise and elevated ethanol concentrations has not been examined. The body of the proposed research will consist of three studies: 1. The effects of temperature on blood ethanol changes during experimental ethanol exposure (i.e. across-subject study). 2. The effects of exercise on blood ethanol levels (i.e. within-subject study). 3. The effects of time of day on blood ethanol levels (i.e. between-subject study). Knowledge of the relationship between environmental factors (e.g. exercise) and blood ethanol concentrations is a necessary component of the development of a more complete pharmacokinetic model of ethanol intoxication. This model should be a necessary part of an approach to the development of a clinical model of the effects of ethanol intoxication on human performance.

“Briar Rose is an amazing character who had a wonderful time at Uni. She proved she had the strength and character to be a hair transplant patient and survive the operation. She’s come away with a beautiful new head of hair and fantastic reviews from the surgeons who are working on her.” “Briar Rose was a fantastic candidate for my clinic – she is very open minded and willing to learn and grow and ultimately made her surgery the most enjoyable treatment ever. Thank you for restoring my confidence after years of dreading my appearance and giving me back what I had lost.” “I would like to say thanks to the team at Bumble and bumble for the beautiful job you have done on my hair. I know it has been a long road for you all, but you have surpassed my expectations in every way and I’m so happy with the end result.” “The whole experience was great and I just want to say how brilliant the staff and team were at Bumble and bumble. Particularly Ben who sorted out all my problems with the stylist. Thanks for

Q: Subsetting a list in a loop in R I've been working with R for almost 4 months and I'm still stuck in some problems. I've done many posts on the web and there I've seen many posts with similar issues but I haven't been able to find a solution. I need to know how to subset a list in a loop. Lets explain: I've a list of character variables. I've also a list with integer values. Now, for each value of the integer list, I'd like to extract from the list of character variables, all the strings that have a similar value. So, a loop that separates the strings into their own list and then extract one list from the list of list according to the values in the integer list. I'm not very good in R language, so I need some help. I'd like to know the command to create a new list with the strings that have similar values in the integer list. Thank you in advance.

A: I would argue that such an operation would be easier with a vectorized solution. For example, it is not difficult to get a list of indices (using which) for matching strings in a character vector: `vec %>% aggregate(strings~ id, FUN= function(x) with(x, strsplit(x, "")[[1]][which(x=="a"))])` # id strings # 1 1 a,b # 2 2 c

Or as a named list: `data.frame(id = c(1, 1, 2, 2, 3, 3), strings = list(a = c("a", "b", "c", "a", "b", "a", "b"),`
