DownloadFast MP4 3GP AVI MPG WMV RM MOV FLV Converter:Q: What is the difference between executable and shared libraries? What is the difference between executable and shared libraries? A: An executable is what the computer actually executes. A shared library is a chunk of code that can be loaded by multiple programs. If you ever want to use the same code twice on different computers, you'll compile that code into a shared library, which can be loaded by multiple programs. This lets you distribute the code with your application and re-use it (and its parts) without having to compile it for every possible machine. A: An executable is what is ultimately executed by the processor. In an x86 machine, it contains code for the machine code instruction set, is linked to other libraries, and usually contains code to make certain hardware available such as I/O ports, video memory, and DMA channels, and access hardware such as HDDs. A shared library is just that. It's a library that contains code that a program can load to use. It usually contains code for an instruction set that is not the processor's instruction set, because it doesn't execute in real time (i.e., just the slightest delay will cause a program to fail). Usually, but not always, shared libraries link in other shared libraries, so that the code in the first library can be used in the second. A popular example of this is the Java language: its many classes are stored in a library called the Java standard libraries. Java programs can link in this library so that their classes are not actually linked to the processor's instruction set, but will still run on any processor that supports that instruction set. Most programs do both. An executable contains the code that is actually executed, while the shared libraries provide the code that is used to access the hardware, such as the OS-specific services of GUI system, and the programs of the OS.
