Category:Computer-related introductions in 2007 Category:Video editing softwareQ: Kafka / Storm /... Spring Boot Configuration I've been trying to get my hands on Storm for a while now, as an alternative to Semaphore for a time-series aggregation job. There is a really nice example on Github about how to have a Finest Word Count App, using Kafka as a message broker. I wish to use this very same example, and I've been struggling to figure out: where are the files for configuring Kafka, and how are they connected to the topology. If I'm to use Storm as an alternative to kafka-spout, where do I put the kafka_spout.xml, so that all the topics can be collected and stored into a single stream? Thank you so much! A: First, you need to set the number of spout instances. Here is an example with 3 spout instances: num.spout.threads = 3 Then, you can either configure Kafka's properties via the KafkaSinkConfig class, or you can use a configuration string. The first method is preferred, since it should be configurable from your application. Here is an example configuration, that configures the KafkaSinkConfig with a config string: num.kafka.topics = {config} Finally, you put the config string to the filesystem in some known location. Here is an example, where Kafka's configuration file is in the classpath: file:///path/to/kafka-server-config-2.10-0.8.1.1.jar!/config/kafka.properties You can always set more settings in the file. Here is an example setting the log.message.format string to json: log.message.format=%F{json} (CNN) -- A new and unexpected obstacle may thwart efforts to find the remains of an unborn baby who was supposedly killed on August 30
