Students in Tshwane, Soweto, braved mid-winter rain to protest the violence against LGBTI people in South Africa. The students also used three inflatable white balloons to symbolise the “blue balloons” used in the Pulse massacre. The protest was organised in response to police raiding houses of LGBTI people and harassing them with questions such as, “Are you girls or boys?”. The intervention was led by the International League against Racism and Struggle (ILRAS) South Africa. The protest was one of about 600 anti-gays demonstrations across the country, which activists say are in response to police raids on LGBTI people in South Africa, where the government is moving to to allow same sex couples to marry. We are waiting for the officers to hand over the materials. After that we will assess whether or not we require a court order.” “There is a lot of tension and emotions in this community, and we have to rely on the emotions of the police as well,” he said. “It’s not just police, it’s families, it’s the community. We are not only acting on police intelligence but on information from our own intelligence, our own research, and some information from the media.” Beetstra said officers entered and searched the homes and that a lot of the raid has “nothing to do” with the Pulse shootings. “Our intelligence was that there was a group of men in that community that had been doing
