High pressure liquid chromatography in petroleum research. High pressure liquid chromatography (HPLC) is a powerful tool for analysis of oil samples. It has a large variety of uses, including solvent extraction, with more than 80 published papers describing the technique. Many of these use HPLC to determine oil viscosity, as viscosity is the most important parameter in controlling the practical performance of a pump in this particular application. Other uses include separation of more than one compound, including sulphur compounds, in a single HPLC run, and analyses of oil samples from the formation by means of interpretation of the chromatograms obtained. This paper reviews the use of HPLC in petroleum research and describes how the oil samples can be prepared for analysis and the problems that may be encountered. A selection of HPLC applications is discussed, together with the advantages and disadvantages of using HPLC in this field.

Q: Windows 7 gets stuck in a loop when connecting to a WAN network I have a Windows 7 PC with a wired LAN connection to my router and an ADSL broadband connection to a WAN gateway in my ISP. I have a VPN client application running on the computer and the computer can connect to my VPN. I can also access the Internet and email through the WAN. When I'm on WiFi, however, Windows 7 becomes unresponsive and the machine shows the "Arbitrary Hardware Error" dialog every 30 seconds until I turn it off or on again, so it can connect to WLAN. How can I fix this? A: I suggest that you delete your Network Connections in the Network and Sharing Center (Right-click My Computer, go to Properties) and then start over. You should then be able to access the Internet from your computer. Also, ensure that your PPTP VPN is not the default VPN connection (Tools/Connections/Right-click Lan and use Properties

Bharathiar University Student, Media and Advertising. The launch is the definitive destination for the international community to find what they're looking for in Malaysia. Kidney transplantation is a complex process that is affected by many biological, clinical, and psychosocial variables. The aim of this study is to examine the psychosocial responses to kidney transplantation and to describe the relationship between such responses and graft outcome. The investigators have studied the psychosocial response in an open-label, longitudinal design using the Multidimensional Assessment of Life Quality (MA-LQ), which includes quality of life (QOL), affect, satisfaction with social support, and distress. They will conduct their study by measuring baseline characteristics of donor and recipient, and by following up these patients post-transplant. The investigators will study 50 kidney recipients and their donors, 25 pre-transplant and 25 post-transplant. The investigators hypothesize that they will show similar gender differences in outcome and mediating variables as in a previous study. Specifically, they will show that pre-transplant distress and poor social support are associated with depressive, post-traumatic stress, and anxiety symptoms in recipients. Furthermore, gender differences will be found in their associations with graft outcome; the association with QOL will be stronger in men than women. Twenty-five years ago this week, a sales representative named Terry Vasquez sat down at a conference table with Dave Packard, Hewlett-Packard's (HPQ) co-founder, an engineer, and an innovator. They'd been talking for about an hour when Packard asked Vasquez if he had any questions. "He wanted to learn about my career and ambitions," Vasquez says. "He was looking to develop further relationships." HP isn't what it used to be. But from Vasquez's perspective, that was the whole point of the two-hour meeting. He's now an HP vice-president and one of the company's top vice-presidents for sales, marketing and services. "Dave invited me to create my own success," he says. Over the years, I've met many successful executives, entrepreneurs, and company founders who talk
