MintelHealthDay Reporter A study published in the journal Circulation found that people who take a daily vitamin D supplement and have lower-than-average levels of "bad" cholesterol have a 54 percent lower chance of having a heart attack. "The research shows that vitamin D may play a significant role in heart health and that vitamin D deficiency may put people at risk for cardiovascular disease," said report author Dr. Paul Thompson, a professor of medicine at the University of Nottingham in England. Vitamin D deficiency has been linked to several chronic diseases, but scientists were skeptical about whether it was really important to maintain a healthy blood cholesterol profile. "This is the first study to show that vitamin D deficiency is associated with higher triglyceride levels, lower HDL cholesterol levels and increased levels of LDL cholesterol," Thompson said. "These associations were independent of body mass index." Thompson noted that the impact of vitamin D on the overall risk of cardiovascular disease needs to be studied further. However, the findings are in line with previous research that showed vitamin D supplementation could help protect against some heart disease. In a study reported in the journal Arteriosclerosis, Thrombosis and Vascular Biology, Thompson and colleagues found that people who regularly took a daily vitamin D supplement had a lower risk of heart disease than those who didn't take it. Researchers looked at the medical records of nearly 10,000 men and women who were enrolled in the Framingham Heart Study, which has followed the medical history of people living in Framingham, Mass., since the 1950s. All of the study participants were screened for vitamin D deficiency and given a daily vitamin D supplement. At that time, the study found that 15 percent of the women and 20 percent of the men had low levels of vitamin D.
