From what I can gather, dragons are quite large mammals which breathe air by lunging it out of their mouths through their nostrils, that they also have openings on their nose that is used to breathe when they're flying. However I don't understand how a dragon maintains air pressure in their lungs while flying. Is it just the difference in air pressure outside their body which allows them to fly? If so, why do they just not have their own source of air pressure? A: It's not just the difference in pressure out in the air that allows them to fly. They also adapt the way they inhale and exhale during flight. The anatomy
