Regional haemodynamic and ventilatory control of oxygen transport to the tissues of the circulation during exercise in humans. Regional haemodynamics and ventilatory control of oxygen transport to the tissues of the circulation in humans were measured in exercise by a technic we developed to evaluate the integrated metabolic responses of the human body to exercise. In all subjects studied, arterial oxygen contents were always in excess of the oxygen contents in the tissues. Blood flow to the brain and heart increased rapidly during exercise but was substantially reduced after exercise. Regional oxygen demands in the brain, heart and liver were close to the maximum levels of oxygen transport required to support O₂ delivery. It was concluded that the arterial oxygen content increased due to a central redistribution of blood volume. Oxygen uptake and arterial O₂-CO₂ contents were almost constant during the exercise period. There was a close correlation between O₂ uptake and O₂ delivery to the tissues of the
