The future of mental health care in the Australian general practice: perspectives of patients and their psychiatrists and general practitioners. Australian mental health policy has aimed to provide more patients with adequate treatment in primary care and to reduce the cost and stigma of care. This exploratory, qualitative study assessed the views of patients and their psychiatrists and general practitioners (GPs) about the impact of mental health reforms on quality and access. Fifteen patients and 10 psychiatrists and GPs from five cities in NSW and Victoria participated. Data collection and analysis employed a set of principles recommended by Polit and Beck to guide grounded theory coding and development. Patients and psychiatrists/GPs believed there had been a rapid increase in primary care mental health provision with greater access to mental health professionals and pharmacotherapy. Patients felt safer in primary care and psychiatrists/GPs felt their knowledge and skills had improved. Patients were reluctant to pursue treatment, especially if they were in poor health. Patients reported fears about stigma and discussed social supports. We developed a framework illustrating psychiatrists' and GPs' knowledge and skills and patients' beliefs about help-seeking and compliance. Patients' views about what should be done to improve service delivery are also explored. The concept of help-seeking was rarely discussed by psychiatrists and GPs despite the influence it could have on treatment outcomes. Psychiatry and GPs perceived a high patient burden that led to referral to tertiary care. GPs' and psychiatrists' attitudes and knowledge about mental health are prominent in the consultation. The role of GPs in mental health care should be expanded to include increased knowledge about mental health and more direct screening for mental health problems. In a context of increasing mental illness and limited resources, improvements in access to primary care mental health services should be prioritised. of Democrats pressing Obama for help in their primary. "It's wonderful what Maxine Waters and others are doing to help a number of the candidates, and I want to thank them," Mnuchin told the Times. Democratic Rep. Maxine Waters of California was once an outspoken opponent of Trump, but she has taken an increasingly prominent role in promoting unity among Democrats and Republicans since the inauguration. Last year, she called on Congress to investigate Trump's businesses. And on Thursday, she urged another outburst of anti-Trump protests — in the form of a Senate filibuster. "I'm hoping that the orange one

My textbox control needs to display this data in a grid, where the best way to do this I believe is to split the data into multiple lines. Because the compare logic will remain the same for all the data in my database, I think the best approach is to assign data from the database to my generic class as a string. Here is what I have so far. public class ComparePeriod { public ComparePeriod() { } public bool Compare(DateTime value1, DateTime value2) {

// Here I need to split the string into multiple lines 3e33713323
