I'm not sure how helpful this will be. I'm assuming this only works for the last query in the trigger. i.e, if you execute a series of inserts it will only return one row. A: The easiest way to handle this from a usage perspective would be to wrap the original query into a temporary table: create table dept_used (id int not null, deptno int not null, primary key (id, deptno)); create or replace trigger trigger_name_test after insert or update or delete or truncate on table begin insert into dept_used
