Photoshop Elements: In addition to the tools and features of Photoshop, Adobe offers an editing program called Photoshop Elements that is geared specifically for a home user. One of its powerful features is that it allows you to upload an image to the internet and work on it from anywhere in the world. As mentioned earlier, it also works on older computers that don't have the memory space for Photoshop. Like Photoshop, Photoshop Elements can be used to perform basic or advanced image editing tasks. Although Photoshop Elements lacks some of the powerful features of Photoshop, it does have a nice set of tools to perform basic editing such as cropping and straightening, merging, color balance, and so on.

Calibrating Your Monitor

If you want to improve your images, you must first calibrate your monitor. (See the preceding section for an explanation of what calibrating your monitor is.) Cameras have a built-in auto white balance function that adjusts the lighting on the photo. However, a monitor with lights on it (such as a computer screen or a projector screen) does not have this option. Your monitor should be calibrated to make sure that the whites on your screen are as white as they can be. Photoshop gives you the opportunity to calibrate your monitor in a couple of different ways:

- White Balance tool: In Color Settings, choose the tab that says Monitor Color Settings (Figures 12-5 and 12-6). This dialog box shows a photograph of a white object on a black background with several pixels marked with a cross to indicate which part of the photo was shaded by the white. Use the controls on the right side of the dialog box to select a point on the monitor and the display window will change to show a graph of the color profile that matches the color in that area (see Figure 12-7). To edit your monitor with the monitor color settings, use the White Balance tool on the right side of the dialog box. The first time you use the White Balance tool, the dialog box will stay open as you pick the monitor to calibrate. After that, you can close the dialog box and pick another monitor to calibrate. You can also calibrate several monitors at the same time. The cross-hairs don't move when you switch from one monitor to another, so you need only to make sure that your cursor is on the correct monitor and click the little eyeball icon to calibr
