A: After much trial and error, I have discovered that every page on the site had the same source code, which was this: I replaced the refresh meta tag with: It worked flawlessly after that. So if you run into this issue just add cache-control to the header of every page on the site. I have no clue why this happens, but it does. EDIT: I have also found that adding these headers to the main.html page seems to work too. Who is speaking on behalf of the students? Does it look like the students are speaking or that they are unhappy with what happened? Thanks for posting this. When I saw it, I asked myself the same thing. I think that a very astute observer might see that the students have experience in presenting the matter to the faculty. If their complaints were well thought-out and thorough, it is not likely that the students would have been relegated to the status of cardboard cut-out protestors. I think that most people will discount this report as a propaganda piece. But suppose that it is not a strawman. The student may be on shaky ground in what he does. Now if the report is a whole cloth fabrication, the students must be serious about the content of their complaints or they are probably leaving matters of academic integrity up to President Proctor to worry about. Please explore the argument presented in the paper. Is this not just basic egotism? I didn't receive any official emails from anyone saying they were cancelling their registration or not attending. I like to be a juror when I get called. I know how the process works. I also know that there are some angles that are not properly presented. It goes both ways. I know that there are cases where a juror disagrees with the verdict and feels that it does not sufficiently conform to their own view of justice. Conversely, we occasionally
