An important fact about Photoshop is that even if you have the full version, you must purchase the individual applications that you use regularly to be able to make use of them. Use Photoshop for Web Layout Professional website designers and graphic designers use Photoshop for more than just creating personal images. The programs that are free for personal use, Photoshop Elements, Photoshop Lightroom, and Photoshop for iPad, offer some amazing capabilities for web design. Can you imagine a webpage with Flash animation all over it? Probably not — and that's probably why the program has been at the heart of Web design for so long. But with Photoshop, you can create simple and complex animations that can be used on websites. If you're thinking about whether you need a desktop version of Photoshop to work on designing a website, use this rule of thumb: If you need to cut, copy, paste, and manipulate images, go with the full version. If you need to create a web page with a few simple animations, use the Elements version. Photoshop isn't the only program that can be used for web design. Web designers use all kinds of programs to create web sites. Some are provided as part of a desktop design program, such as

Adobe Flash, which can be used to create all kinds of animations. Others are available as stand-alone programs, such as Dreamweaver, which can be used for web design even without the Flash program. Creating a Website Template You can't go far on the web without finding templates. Templates are the mechanism that allows web designers to quickly build websites that look like each other. Web designers use templates to save time and to avoid the need to create all the elements that make up the look of a page. You don't create templates when you first create a page — you can always adjust your design to fit your needs. But you can take a template that your web designer created and adjust it to suit your personal needs. You must create your own web templates in a program of your choice. Adobe Dreamweaver doesn't create templates. Adobe Dreamweaver does give you the tools to create a page and add components. But Adobe Photoshop can do this job as well, and it does it at a much faster rate and without requiring a lot of manual work. Photoshop has its own collection of templates included with the program. The basics of a web template are almost identical to the basics of a web page. You can design your own templates
