Keep in mind that it is impossible to completely erase the images that you have on your hard drive. However, before you do something you should know exactly what you are doing because after your photos are modified they may be permanently changed. If you are not sure, perhaps a copy of the original image should be made before any other work is done. Camera Connection In order to connect your camera and computer via USB, you must first have a USB port on both your camera and your computer. Typically, the USB port on your computer will be found on the side of the computer or on the computer's front panel. On some computers, the USB port is on the bottom of the computer. On a Mac computer, the port is on the back of the computer. To connect a camera to a computer, find the USB port on the back of the computer. Attach the USB cable between your camera and the computer and then turn on the computer to find that the camera is recognized. Previewing Your Images Before you start any changes, take a quick look at your image. You can preview the image, either in Photoshop's Layers panel or in the Layers palette. The Layers palette is the default tool for viewing your layer stack or layer stack view. The Layers panel also offers some useful information about the image, but it's more difficult to use than the Layers palette. Before you start any work, look at each layer to see which is in color, which is in black and white, and which is transparent or masked. In the sections that follow, you examine the types of adjustments you can make and how to improve the image. Checking your image in the Layers panel or in the Layers palette When you preview your image, you see only the final state of the layer stack. It doesn't tell you how the image looked while it was being created. The layers help you see which layers were added to the image, which were edited, and which were not altered. The Layers panel provides a good overview of the settings that apply to the image as a whole. If you want a more in-depth inspection of each layer, then use the Layers palette to individually view each of the layers. In addition, the Layers palette provides a better overall view of the layers and shows them in a much more compact form. Checking your image in the Layers panel When you view the Layers panel

What's New in the?

This hasn't exactly been the most productive week for President Barack Obama. It's hard to recover from a week where you didn't do much, but it was better than the first week when you couldn't do anything. Obama's plan to win Iran's permission to build nuclear reactors was thwarted when the Iranian Parliament voted to delay. Obama's negotiations with Congress about U.S. debt have taken a back seat to a whole bunch of others. So it should surprise no one that Obama has finally found some time to pay attention to Benghazi. "What happened in Benghazi was a terrorist attack," Obama told Israeli President Shimon Peres in a joint press conference on Monday. "Now, for us to immediately grab our guns and go hunt down individuals that are on the ground is illogical." His concern was clear. Obama understands that the deaths in Benghazi were crimes, but they were not terrorist acts. He also knows that this isn't the first time there has been an active attack on American diplomatic facilities and that the Obama administration's quick response to those attacks has not boded well for his presidency. "What I've been very clear about is, is that no acts of terror will ever shake the resolve of this great nation," Obama said. "So even the very painful pictures that we see on television will never penetrate our national consciousness or change who we are as a people." Obama is right. Americans do not want to get involved in another war, even if the American ambassador was killed in Benghazi. But what the president doesn't understand is that there are military actions that are justifiable and necessary. Like the time when the Marine barracks in Beirut were attacked. The U.S. could have dispatched troops to make sure that the Lebanon treaty protecting Israel from attacks that might be expected by the Arabs was upheld. Yet the president never sent a single soldier. So instead of risking American lives for a treaty that Americans don't want and that he just learned about in a meeting, he called it a terrorist attack and turned the diplomatic mission into a Benghazi. Yes, the attack was stopped and no American troops were needed. But the killing was still a tragedy. And the blame goes to the president. Killing is not who we are. It's nothing that Obama would ever want to admit. But he would rather our soldiers had to risk their lives in the desert and on the seas to fight terrorists so he could call the deaths in Benghazi a
