in our nation's history and moral compass," Sarah Sobel, the moderator for Friday's town hall, explained. "I think it is appropriate to ask that Senator Warren leave those questions be asked for her." With Warren, it's hard to tell what's fake and what's for real. It's even harder to decide what to believe. Was it her "I have a plan for that" response to criticism of her comments about bankruptcy or her routine denials of such attacks? Did she really compare herself to the advocates of civil rights in the '60s, as she would frequently claim? It didn't seem like it. But, when you take a closer look, it's clear that her liberal opponents wanted a character attack, not an honest debate, and that it's doubtful she'll be forced to account for her completely phony past. The guy who convinced her to run and the employer who's paying her $350,000 a year to say we're not getting what we're paying for now say she's trustworthy, that she won't fire her own staff if she wins or campaign against him for election. They even say she can't be influenced by money, as her 2013 health care plan didn't change at all since she rolled it out last year. As usual, the Boston Globe has a nice explanation of the 2016 race that I haven't seen — and it gives us a nice insight into the strategy of the Democratic candidates. On Wednesday, the Globe reported: White-collar executive Beth Orton has emerged as the newest candidate looking to land in the top tier of Democrats campaigning for the presidency. And she's come up with a strategy to make a "big play" on Wall Street. "We're doing this with my own money, and we're going to keep doing this as long as we have to to win the nomination," said Orton, a spokeswoman for Human Rights Campaign, the gay-rights advocacy group, whose members raised $8.5 million for Democrats in the third quarter. ... Orton, a longtime ally of Sen. Elizabeth Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat who has attacked Wall Street, has been shadowing her around the state and has been speaking out on the Microfibrillar water intercalates into the hydrophilic regions of asbestos fibers. The basic structure of a hydrophilic or polar solvent in a protein (polypeptide) or in the unfolded state of a globular protein can be studied using polarized Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) spectroscopy. These studies are enhanced by the use of a combination of amide I and amide II FTIR spectroscopic techniques that permit monitoring of the change in the structure of the alpha-helix and beta-sheet components. Here, we analyze the change in the water structure of microfibrillar azo-UICC crocidolite asbestos fibers as a function of the extent of surface exposure using this technique. While the surface exposed samples are completely dehydrated, the water structure changes when the fibers are desiccated into microfibers. The results show a large increase in the water component of the amide I band and a corresponding decrease in the water component of the amide II band. The FTIR spectra from water bound in the microfibrils are assigned to two types of water: unordered water bound at polar interfaces and ordered water in the hydrophilic regions of the microfibrils. Since the polar nature of the amide I and the hydrophilic nature of the amide II arise from the interaction between water and polar regions of the polypeptide backbone, these results suggest that the most hydrophilic regions of the microfibrils are rich in the fiber helices.

Q: How to download full size of all PDF attachments in a document from Office 365 API? I need to download full size of all attachments in a document from Office 365 API. I have managed to achieve downloading single attachment with below code: `List list = Microsoft.Office.Client.PowerShell.CmdletInvokedUrl.ParseRelativeUrl(docUrl, out docId, out listToken, out attachment); attachment.DownloadFile();` But, if the attachment is an embedded Excel file, the code above will only download the excel file. How to get the excel file full size of that attachment? A: I have found the answer myself after hard tried. The below code is for external attachments.
