* The command line. In more than one sense, the term can be used for any powerful command-line tool—such as the Unix program called grep. However, in the context of Photoshop, I'm referring to the type of command-line tool that enables you to load and save files from Photoshop images and to view the embedded file information. When the term Photoshop Command Line is used here, it's usually referring to the Photoshop program itself, but that meaning is sometimes abbreviated as the "Photoshop cli."

Q: Python: Trying to run a script from CLI, issues with filenames I'm trying to run a script from the command line but I'm having issues with the path and the file name. I have looked at a few of the other questions on this site about this problem, but the suggested solutions haven't been working for me. I have a list of file names that I'm parsing from a file. I'm just trying to run each file and then print the resulting file. This works perfectly in a python console: from tts.lib.speak import Speak import TTS import os from os import listdir dir = os.listdir(r'C:\Users\chris.simmons\source') for filename in dir: print filename speak = Speak() filename = os.path.join(r'C:\Users\chris.simmons\source', filename) print speak.play(filename) The script works perfectly. When I try to run this script from the command line I get an error that says: CommandError: unexpected error: traceback= message=FileNotFoundError(2, 'File not found:'+ f)' I have also tried: os.chdir(r'C:\Users\chris.simmons\source') but I get the same error. I have also tried: `speak = Speak() speak.play(os.path.join(r'C:\Users\chris.simmons\source', filename))` but I get the same error. If the entire path is a problem, how can I get that information? If it's the file name that's causing the problem, then I'm having trouble with that too. Thanks in advance for your help!

A: Generally speaking, you'll get a better error message if you split up your code into multiple functions. Right now, your `play()` function is built to play one file, and it crashes if it can't find one. Rather than keep hardcoding the name in your ](#key280-T3){ref-type="table"}). It may seem strange that there were no consistent end-points at which the standard meta-analyses diverged from the adjusted indirect comparison. Perhaps it would have been informative to estimate the effect of different levels of perinatal mortality on neonatal mortality. However, death was not an outcome in all trials of antenatal steroids with reported mortality. Furthermore, the relationship between neonatal mortality and perinatal mortality is unclear. Finally, in the studies with a comparison between antenatal steroids and placebo, few neonatal deaths were observed, and in this situation the meta-analyses with the different statistical approaches performed very similarly \[[@key280-B16]\]. Overall, the effect of perinatal mortality on adjusted indirect comparisons and the standard meta-analyses are similar, indicating that it is appropriate to model the relationship between outcome and treatment with a logistic regression or marginal structural model as part of the indirect comparison methodology. Our results also showed that there was little difference in efficacy between different routes of administration (nasal and intravenous) in reducing neonatal mortality. This is perhaps unsurprising as it has long been known that premature infants respond well to antimicrobial therapy; hence it may be expected that the route of administration would not have a major impact on efficacy \[[@key280-B19]\]. There was an increased efficacy of nebulized and intravenous steroids in reducing neonatal mortality, suggesting that these routes of administration were more effective than nasal steroids. The results for primary neonatal morbidity were more variable with smaller effects for both routes of administration, and a greater reduction of intraventricular haemorrhage with intravenous steroids than for nebulized steroids. Perhaps this suggests that intravenous steroids are particularly effective for a small number of neonatal morbidities, although the extent to which the effects of steroids are determined by treatment-related or unmeasured factors cannot be determined from these results. The indirect comparison methodology relies on the assumption that all study participants are exposed to the same risk of the outcome, and that the comparison is made without differential bias. The principal advantage of the adjusted indirect comparison approach over standard meta-analyses is the opportunity to directly adjust for selection bias by using the hazard ratio for each treatment group from a Cox proportional hazards model of survival. This does not take into account any differences between the indirect and direct comparison treatment effects in terms of the underlying risk of the outcome, which is
