ELVIS PRESLEY, ALOHA FROM FROM HAWAIIAN...Robustness of plant vertical acclimation to changes in xylem tension and embolism in response to a drying-rewetting cycle. By identifying the underlying physiological and structural mechanisms that mediate an organism's ability to acclimate to repeated changes in their surrounding environment, we can better predict how ecosystems and/or plants will respond to long-term environmental change. One obvious ecophysiological strategy to enhance the fitness and productivity of organisms exposed to fluctuating conditions is that of acclimation, whereby key biochemical and physiological parameters become less sensitive to changing environmental conditions. In this study, we investigated how plants with intact xylem transport tissues acclimate to changes in water potential, xylem tension and embolism in response to a drying-rewetting cycle. The patterns of maximum hydraulic conductivity (L_p) and xylem pressure (P) against a variable root hydraulic conductivity gradient (L_p/L_r) and against lignin peroxidase activity (LPI) were investigated for two tree species that differ in their root morphology, Douglas-fir (Pseudotsuga menziesii (Mirb.) Franco var. glauca (Beissn.) Franco) versus black spruce (Picea mariana (Mill.) B.S.P.). For both trees, P increased in response to decreasing water potential, whereas L_p was relatively insensitive to the same changes in water potential. Therefore, the initial rate of water transport into the xylem was independent of changes in water potential. Additionally, P increased linearly with L_p and L_p/L_r whereas LPI did not change with L_p/L_r , suggesting that LPI is nonlinearly related to P and that L_p/L_r is an alternative way to quantify the relationship between P and L_p . The responses of P , L_p and L_p/L_r to rewetting were also investigated. In these studies, P , L_p and L_p/L_r were all decreased after rewetting, and all three parameters were nonlinearly related to P . Finally, it was determined that the xylem of both trees was able to acclimate to changes in water potential during a drying-rew d0c515b9f4
