The application has started to show some odd issues with the performance. On the login screen, the user can swipes to sign in with their smart card. If they do so at a kiosk, its pretty acceptable but at a laptop (where there is no such swiping option), it is slow as slug. The application is a lot of event handling, data parsing and some calculations. When we use perfmon to profile the Winform app, we see the following I am unable to locate the third point here. I do not see any Forms Application Perfmon trace capturing the application exit. I have some additional concerns for the above points Is there any application performance debugging tools available for.NET applications? I am able to find an application profiling tool under PerformanceMon.exe Is there any tool which will tell me where in the application there is a lot of event handling code like for example subscribing to a delegate to a control. My application has lots of controls. In fact, we have to subscribe to 40+ controls for navigation purposes. The components which do that are all inside a pre-defined class(all inherited from one base class). During the object lifetime, the subscription is recorded in a member variable. I am trying to find out where I can improve the application performance. Have you faced any similar issues, where you got diagnostics on the application performance bottlenecks. A: Turn off event logging, and see if the unexpected slowdown occurs there as well. , you'll notice several variations that we've included in our Classic Shop over the past few months. Not only that but if you want something custom you can work with us to create a specific variation. We've included both examples in this post with the Classic Shop, but check out the Custom Shop here: Simple Commission: A simple commission that was
