If I have a new client that wants to hire me for a project (without any previous experience with my work), is it OK to ask them if I can use my payment to buy out my old projects (that I don't want to work on) and start working for them? A: You should always be upfront with new clients about your plans. After all, you never know if they're going to be a friend or foe. In my experience, asking a client to pay you to not work sounds a bit over the top, as they are paying you to work anyway. The typical course of action is to pay you a bonus to work on a different project, that may take some lead time before starting, in exchange for paying off the first project. Say for example you've earned 10,000 for the first project, and they'd agree to put 2,000 aside for you to start your new project. You start working on the new project right away, and do it for a few months, then at some point, you meet the deadline and invoice them for the rest, 2,000. If you decide to do this, the client should have no say in how you set things up, and the contract should cover all conditions of payment. A: Yes. Absolutely! Especially if you're an employee, if they expect you to work on their job for free, you can ask them what the expectation is and then 1cdb36666d
