Comparing two proposed models for forecasting visits to the emergency department: an applied case study. Two models for forecasting emergency department (ED) visits were compared to assess their ability to predict future visits in a hospital in Sydney, New South Wales, Australia. Both models used data from ED patients over a 2-year period, 4 months prior to the intervention and 6 months after the intervention. One model used extra-temporal dynamics that consisted of a linear regression equation with multiple variables. The other model used a Type II multivariable fractional polynomial regression to assess the effect of the intervention on observed visit numbers. We applied the two models using both graphical and statistical analyses. A total of 622 visits occurred during the study period and the root mean squared errors (RMSE) for the two models were 6.2 and 17.8 visits respectively. Model 1 used an extra-temporal estimate based on the past 5 years (n = 1468) with an RMSE of 14.3. Model 2 used a local estimate based on the previous month and the intervention year (n = 46) with an RMSE of 15.0. Model 1 performed well in terms of prediction accuracy but it does not capture the non-linear effect of the intervention. Model 2 is more flexible but has a larger RMSE than the more parsimonious model 1. The use of extra-temporal modeling techniques may provide more accurate predictions in scenarios where the intervention is an acute, unexpected event.Combination of inhibition of the estrogen receptor alpha and estrogen receptor beta androgen receptor and of vitamin D receptor. Estrogen receptor (ERalpha, ERbeta, AR and VDR) levels were determined by immunoblotting in four human breast carcinoma (MCF-7, T-47D, MDA-MB-231) cell lines and in cells from different murine mammary tumors. Clonal cell lines, expressing at least one hormone receptor were selected. In breast carcinoma cell lines, except for ERalpha, which was detected in all, ERbeta was down-regulated in T-47D cells by the addition of recombinant AR to the culture medium. ERalpha was down-regulated 648931e174

I'm wondering if there is a way to create a modal that uses a model's array to specify the values to display in it. I want to create a modal with a pre-set options (i.e. some radials, some text, some images) for the user. So instead of the user having to set these values individually in each form, I'd like to use an array for it. Example of modal: Hello World click image JS: $(function(){ var radialOptions = [['radial', 'text-01'], ['radial', 'image-01'], ['radial', 'image-02'],]; var opts = radialOptions.map(function(item){ return { modal: item[0], text: item[1] }; }); $.get('radial.html', {data: opts}, function(result){ $('#radial').html(result).modal('show'); }); }); The modal is supposed to set up each option in the array
