technique: logging or raising an exception? The main purpose of using exceptions is to notify client and user-application code that something unexpected happened.

By that, it prevents the program from going into an infinite loop because of a mistake in the code. However, there is something that's not shown in the following example. The exception handler can only tell you that the exception happened, but it couldn't do anything about it. If I didn't use a try..except block, and directly wrote to output files without a try..except, the program would still break.

This program fails if you uncomment the first line.
try:
    f = open('input_1.txt')
except IOError:
    print 'Error opening file: %s' % sys.exc_info()[0]
f = open('output_1.txt') # This program breaks, no exception was triggered.

open('output_1.txt') # f =
open('input_1.txt') # This program does not break

We describe two patients with the variant form of erythrokeratoderma variabilis, who have novel coding sequence alterations of the phosphodiesterase 4D gene. The clinical features of one patient matched those of the classic form, but the other patient had extensive involvement of the trunk and extremities and a marked propensity for photosensitivity. Mutation analysis revealed two novel heterozygous missense alterations, T293I and R896H, which were both found to be associated with significant enzyme deficiency. The T293I mutant had a low activity compared with other phosphodiesterase 4D mutants and was shown to be localized in the cytosol by using fluorescently labeled antibody, whereas R896H enzyme was localized mainly in the cytosol. These findings suggest that phosphodiesterase 4D is important in the control of epidermal keratinocyte differentiation, and indicate that the pathogenesis of erythrokeratoderma variabilis is distinct from that of psoriasis vulgaris.The invention relates to a radio-frequency identification module and, in particular, to a method for producing a module having the functionality of a transmission-reception
