Enhance your photos with depth-of-field effects using our PhotoDirector 6 Professional. “Cat” is having her second of many “cycles” of anesthesia during a surgical procedure. She had the first cat-scheduled procedure a month ago and that was right before the birth of her newest litter. She was scheduled for another surgery this week in her elbow, which had been causing her pain for a few months. Barely six weeks old, she was anesthetized and a rod inserted into her shoulder to keep it straight. But she still can't reach her back legs. “It's like she's always walking on her elbows. I know how young she is,” says owner Erin Scrivner, a 27-year-old waitress at Red Robin, “but it just seems like it's constantly bothering her.” Scrivner has brought her to the surgery center at least a dozen times in the past month, sometimes in a carrier, sometimes alone, but always with a towel draped over her. Scrivner says she doesn't mind taking the cat to the vet when it's an emergency, but the constant trips back and forth are tiring for her. The practice, 2883 E. Midlothian Drive, is no stranger to cat surgery. As soon as the open-book vet clinic opened in June, it became known that the clinic was doing cat surgery, too. The clinic is run by a group of veterinarians — Dr. Joel Schorowitz is the doctor of record — who use volunteer veterinary assistants to provide small animal services at the clinic on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons. The idea for the practice was hatched about a year ago by veterinarian Dr. Meryl Dailey. The practice doesn't have a physical location — veterinary assistants meet in the back offices of the practice so they are not on the public side of the clinic. The clinic was built to serve ailing cats, said assistant veterinarian Julie Dicke. "Most of the cats are rescues and we get them out of the shelters and they come back frequently with ailments," Dicke said. The practice offers services such as
