The present invention relates to a flexible flat cable, and more particularly to a method for manufacturing a flexible flat cable having a reduced thickness. One example of a conventional flexible flat cable is shown in FIG. 10, in which a cover 101 is attached to the reverse side of an insulation film layer 102. In addition, there are proposed various techniques for reducing the thickness of the flat cable. For example, in Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 71596/85, a nonwoven fabric is used for the covering material of a flexible flat cable, while in Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 115570/85, the thickness of a cover is regulated to prevent the excessive increase of the width of a flexible flat cable. In addition, a flexible flat cable shown in FIG. 11 has been proposed as a solution of the problem of the increase in width due to the relative adhesion of a cover and an insulation film layer. In this flexible flat cable, an insulation film layer 102 and a cover 101 are formed to have a V-shape, and the V-shape is covered with another insulation film layer 103 so as to retain the relative position between the insulation film layers. In the flat cable shown in FIG. 11, the thickness of the insulation film layer is reduced to reduce the relative adhesion of the cover and the insulation film layers. However, since the thickness of the insulation film layer is reduced to suppress the increase of the relative adhesion, there is a problem of reduced flexibility. In theory it does not make sense. In this case, the lower frequency corresponds to the partially stripped nucleus, and the corresponding upper frequency is the outer and more stable crust. At first sight, no mixing of these two frequencies can be seen, but closer inspection shows that the low-frequency g -mode is beating with the crust. This is the same effect, that was seen in Tiburzi2019, when the crust was not present at all. For both crust modes, we plot the corresponding relative damping time as a function of the tidal deformability, following Equation (1). Results are presented in Figure 1.
