Yup, there is really no need to create a green profile and there is no real reason to use it. You can use my semi-green profile if you want, but it's not really recommended. I'd recommend just turning your game down and lowering the v-sync. Any ideas? I have since discovered this is a known bug with the newer operating systems. I was wondering if there are any workarounds. I would like to add (and switch) virtual desktops in Windows 10. A: In the new Window 10, there's no visual clue of one window on another. The classic Windows 7 model, where you can see "X" on the screen for instance, indicating the X is on a different "window" on the screen, is gone. Windows 10 is a direct-to-the-user experience, without any intermediary, and as such, there is no visual clue as to the presence of one window on another. If you want to switch windows between two, you can enable the Windows 7 parquet taskbar, and any window that appears on top of another window, will cause a drop-down window border to appear. But this won't actually switch between two windows, only change which window you're currently in (sort of) - it will still only be the active window. You would have to use the taskbar/window list to switch the windows. The older Windows 7 parquet taskbar is still present - it's just in the new settings (Settings > System > Advanced) under the " d0c515b9f4
