Species distribution maps are a key component in a strategy to incorporate habitat loss into ecological niche modeling. The vast majority of habitat loss and conversion of wetlands to agriculture, urban areas, and roads occurs in the microhabitats underlying the canopies. Such topographic habitat loss, fragmentation and isolation can reduce the distribution of juvenile habitat for breeding birds. This study examines habitat loss to determine if vegetation loss and cover values differ in the canopies and microhabitats. Total loss of vegetation cover, aboveground biomass (AGB) of tallest individual plants (e.g. Phragmites australis) and AGB of whole stands (e.g. Phragmites australis) were determined. Loss of cover, AGB and biomass in habitats were determined over a 1 km period in both depth and width in microhabitats at 3 watershed locations in the U.S. Northeast. Location-specific average canopy loss of Phragmites australis ranged from 18-37%. Percent loss in the stand ranged from 17-39%. Loss in the canopy ranged from 5-10% to 15-45%. Percent cover loss ranged from 0.3-10%. Loss of biomass in habitats ranged from 4-46%. Thus, loss in the canopies affects the substrate and thus habitats 648931e174
