PHOTOSHOP USES An image can be printed, scaled, rearranged, cropped, rotated, and recolored. That's the basic Photoshop function. You can even make a photo a collage by cutting out pieces of it and placing them together. When an image has been processed, it can also be printed, sent by e-mail, or displayed on a Web site. You can even use Photoshop to make your own music videos. With Photoshop's broad array of editing tools, you can make almost anything you can think of. Because of this broad menu of powerful options, Photoshop can open up a new dimension for you. For this reason, I use Photoshop even when I can find a cheaper image editor program, such as GIMP. Edit: Adding visual effects You can even use Photoshop to add visual effects to your image. You can add fake 3-D borders to it (with the Border function) and even add texture (with the Texture feature). You can add filters (notably the Photoshop Filter functions, which I explain in Chapter 15), overlay images to your photos (see Chapter 11), and even apply spot filters (a more advanced version of the Filter function). Change the settings on your image's color, lighting, exposure, and color balance. You can even protect it from being copied and instead embed a copyright notice in it. You can use Photoshop to create your own designs. You can even make a collage by cutting out pieces of the picture. You can extract a single color from an image — say red or blue — and then make it disappear within the image. You can rotate or flip a graphic image. You can even use Photoshop to make your own music videos. THE UNEXPECTED BY-PRODUCT Not too long ago, a customer sent me a photo that she wanted me to enhance by adding an edge to it. She had used GIMP, which is the free equivalent of Photoshop, to crop, resize, and enhance the image. The image was very good, but when she cropped it, she was able to isolate and copy the area that she wanted to enhance. She then took that exact area and placed it into a new Photoshop file and pasted it into the canvas. The result was a nice, blown-out image with an edge around it. On her original image, I couldn't tell that she had even copied and pasted the area from the new file. It simply

Pages Friday, September 7, 2016 Manresa Triptych I've been meaning to do something with my Manresa set for a while and wanted to wait until I had made a quilt with it. Well, I finally made a quilt! And I made it while in the midst of moving. It's a really scrappy quilt made with leftover fabric from other quilts that I was just going to throw out. I made each block separately and then pieced them together to form the quilt top. The four sections are quilted with a butterfly stitch, but then the quilt is bound with the chain pieces along the perimeter. This is one that I'm happy I got done so that I know there will be a quilt ready to wrap the little one in. I also used a little bit of leftover fabric from one of my other Manresa quilts to make the binding for this one. I followed the instructions on the label, making one long binding strip and cutting it into five 1" wide strips. I did the same on the other side as well. I love the little flowers on the Manresa quilts, so I had to include them on this one as well. I made a very small version of this quilt in July for the Sew Much Patchwork. We traveled a lot when the little one was born and I didn't get to a quilt shop much in the months just after she was born. I've been really wishing I'd bought some batting and gotten started on those Manresa blocks, but as I was making her quilt top I thought, "Well, there's always next time!" "You have just been bitten by the quilting bug! I wish I had known. I would have tried to get you started on that quilt a little sooner." I like the challenge of making a quilt without a sewing machine! But hopefully in the next few months I'll get back into sewing, I'll be starting college next week, and I want to build my quilt stash. 2 comments: Oh, yes, there should be more catching up to do. Did you make the baby blanket from that issue of Sew Much Patchwork yet? I love your Manresa quilt, and the binding is so pretty. I'm not sure about cutting individual binding strips, but I think I'm going to look up how to do something similar to that. Thanks for sharing
