The Foxholes are a small but dedicated group of blog authors who have made the decision to use their real names. This site is intended as a way for any punter out there to locate others who share common interests. Friday, September 07, 2005 Home: Away: A Postcard I spent my Friday evening at the matinee of Adventureland. This was a really fun and relaxing film. The story line is simple: an author goes on vacation with his girlfriend, but she wants to meet his parents. So to get her there, he decides to bring his parents on the trip. However, when they arrive, they find out that he isn't really there. It's a comedy and it's free, so I went. Anyway, the director had a simple theme for the film. You know, a few years ago, people began living in apartments or houses, but now everyone seems to prefer to live in the country. And here the film is - an apartment building on one end of the world, and a farmhouse, with a working farm, on the other. So the film was from what seemed a very restricted perspective. The next film I am about to review is The Departed. This is another of the mid-budget Hong Kong films. It stars Mark Wahlberg, who is usually pretty good, but in this film, he was pretty much wasted as an Irish cop. The film is a crime/detective story. It's set in Hong Kong, and we can guess that Wahlberg's character is an Irish cop, and he gets partnered up with a Chinese cop. However, we don't know that this will turn out to be good, because the two cops don't seem to have anything in common. It's just that they are from different countries. Wahlberg's usual gang, (Richard Gere, Robert DeNiro and Jack Nicholson), is in it, but in the usual way they are just supporting actors. DeNiro and Nicholson are both supposed to be mafia bosses, but both are really soft, innocent guys. Richard Gere is the Australian cop in charge of the investigation. As in The Departed, Mark Wahlberg is in his usual role of being a guy who gets shot while telling a joke. The most interesting character in the film is Alec Baldwin. He is also in the usual role of a smart guy who gets shot without telling a joke. The difference is, he's played
