The problem is that they do not know what they are trying to build. ------ mwpmaybe "There are two novels that can change a bookish youth's life: The Lord of the Flies and The Lord of the Rings. One is a childish fantasy that often invites pedantry; the other a peerless analysis of the origins of good and evil." — John Gardner, Grendel ------ jokoon Well I hope we live in a time where we don't ask too much of people. I don't need to see a smartphone, I don't need to see all of the apps available, or all the information we can have. I just need to look at people. I need to connect with the people around me and discover them. Everything else is just a distraction. And if the people around

Right now I have just made a function that will echo the variable and I want to store the result of the echo into a variable in order to be able to insert it into another script. from datetime import datetime def set_var(var): dtime = datetime.now() var.append(dtime) print(dtime) print(var) def example(): var1 = 'test' set_var(var1) var2 = 'test' set_var(var2) var3 = 'test' set_var(var3) example() My script that is called, I wish I could make the variable itself the string I want it to be inserted into, but I am aware of how Python will pass a reference to the variable in the scope it is created, when the value is changed, you could never make the variable a string by using a list or something, you will always have the variable as an object. What would be a good solution for this? A: In a nutshell, you would want to use a datatype that allows you to have a unique identifier for each "event", and your event listener would record the changes and then replace the original value with the updated value when it's time for the function to get called again. use a dictionary: events = b7e8fdf5c8
