The provision of the goods is conditional upon the signatory of the sales contract providing adequate security for payment of the goods. If the debtor receives the goods, or any of them, without any retention of title, the debtor is not liable to the creditor for the value of the goods received until the debtor has rendered adequate security for their payment. In cases where the contract of sale is an order for goods, the provision of the goods is also conditional upon the signatory of the sales contract providing adequate security for payment of the goods. The rule that a mere acceptance of a product without actual or constructive possession is not a contract of sale shall not apply to a sale contract in respect of services where that service is rendered on an instalment basis. In such cases the full value of the instalment payments shall be available security for the goods, and the provision of the goods on the basis of the instalment payments shall be conditional upon the signatory of the sales contract providing adequate security for payment of the instalment payments. In such cases, the provision of the goods on the basis of the instalment payments is conditional upon the signatory of the sales contract providing adequate security for payment of the instalment payments. Where a contract for the supply of goods is an instalment payment contract, the debtor is entitled to retention of all of the goods which he receives, and the provision of the goods on the basis 595f342e71
