Q: Why doesn't libc work? I'm trying to use the information the programmer has in his/her'man' (manual) pages. Here is a scenario where I need to know what C call libc makes to do 2 things: Open a file, or a directory, or a filename, or a handle. Make a call to printf(). This is example code, based on this post. It basically looks for the printf function in libc. Which is the function(s) I'm interested in. It seems to work fine, printing out the results in the third print statement, which is what I'm concerned about. However it does not print out the results in the first print statement. Any ideas? printf("%s", "something"); printf("%s", "something"); A: #include #include #include int main(void) { char* a = "something"; char* b = "something"; printf("%s, %s".a,b); free(a); free(b); return 0; } Prints something, something On int main(void) { char* a = malloc(5); strcpy(a, "something"); printf("%s".a); free(a); free(a); return 0; } Prints something Variations in clonal and nonclonal thymic and peripheral T cell receptor gamma gene rearrangements in healthy and immunodeficient humans. Inappropriate chromosome translocation and deletion in immunodeficient humans has resulted in T cell malignancies, but such cytogenetic changes may also be found in normal individuals. Hence, to understand the basis for T cell malignancy, the T cell receptor (TCR) gamma gene rearrangements of various normal and immunodeficient individuals have been analyzed by using a TCR gamma clone probe. In normal subjects, patterns of TCR gamma gene rearrangements from peripheral blood (PB) lymphocytes were similar to clonally

AKT, a serine/threonine protein kinase, plays a pivotal role in the proliferation and migration of tumor cells by the regulation of downstream pathways. microRNAs (miRNAs) as a novel class of non-coding regulatory RNAs have been found to play important roles in tumorigenesis. However, the role of miRNA-187 (miR-187) in regulating the expression of AKT and its biological function in prostate cancer (PCa) is still unknown. In this study, we investigated the effects of the overexpression of miR-187 on the proliferation and migration of PCa cells. A miR-187 mimics was transfected into LNCaP and PC-3 cells. The expression of AKT protein and
