The present invention relates to an apparatus for controlling the transfer of power from a generator to a load. More particularly, the present invention provides a controller that adjusts the duty cycle of a power transmission line connected to a generator and the power used to operate a load in response to an overload of the generator. It is well known that when a generator is operating normally, the output power of the generator is transmitted to a load by connecting a power transmission line. The average power level received by the load from the generator is referred to as the generator rating. For a generator operating under nominal conditions, a power transmission line is sized to provide the appropriate level of power. It is known that when a generator overload conditions are present, the output power can be decreased by disconnecting the load from the generator by shutting off the power transmission line. However, the use of a power transmission line to disconnect the load from the generator is not desirable for a number of reasons. In particular, it is very difficult to disconnect a load from a generator using a power transmission line because it is normally very difficult to break a power transmission line. In addition, there is a need to disconnect a load from a generator using a power transmission line when the generator overload condition occurs. The present invention provides a unique apparatus and method for disconnecting a load from a generator that overcomes the above-mentioned disadvantages. More specifically, the present invention provides a controller for an alternating current (AC) power source that adjusts the duty cycle of the AC power source in response to a generator overload condition. In a preferred embodiment, the controller includes an oscillator that generates a periodic signal at a variable frequency. The controller also includes a frequency detector that detects the frequency of the periodic signal. A duty cycle controller
