Q: Is the voltage drop across any resistors always the same? As I know, it depends on the resistor type and the amount of current but I am wondering if the voltage drop across a resistor always the same for all types, regardless of the current? I am currently using an ATmega2560 and I find that the voltage is not linearly related to the current which I am happy with. However I'm sure there are other types of resistors where the voltage does not depend on the current. A: The resistance of the resistor is proportional to the logarithm of the current through it. In fact, a resistor's resistance is proportional to the logarithm of the ratio of the current through it to the amount of material in the resistor; and it's the area of the resistor that it is related to. When you have a resistor with a fixed current, the voltage through it is proportional to the inverse of the resistance. For instance, $\frac{V}{I} = \frac{R}{\ln(I)}$. A: Yes, in general the voltage drop for a resistor is independent of current. It is a power law equation where the resistance is a constant and the current is a variable. In a real world, the coefficient of the power law equation will vary with temperature, component tolerances, and other factors. In an ideal world, the coefficients would all be 1.0, and in a real world they will deviate from that. Q: php no echo when there is no variables in session I'm trying to make a simple php script to redirect from the login page to the homepage if there's a username and pass but if I have not that information in the username and pass, it must not redirect the users to the login page. this is the script: You have already logged in, so please retry the process."; } ?> can anyone tell me what is

You can play the game with almost any kind of currency, but for convenience of the trading platforms, most players use the following combinations: Bitcoin (BTC) / Litecoin (LTC) / Rubi Coin (XRB) I think it is most useful to look at the players behind the game. The players Websites offering The Block Trading The players behind the game are not sites offering the game, but rather payment processors called Skycoin Pay.
