A push to make it easier for Syrian refugees to obtain legal permanent residence has been rejected by the Liberal government, despite recommendations from the Immigration Department that the policy be made more generous. Under the current rules, Syrian refugees are not eligible to make a refugee claim. But the government quietly agreed in December 2013 to place a Syrian refugee on a program to fast-track permanent resident status. The victim of a deadly shooting in a Quebec City mosque in January claimed asylum in Canada as a Syrian refugee. Story continues below advertisement The Immigration Department recommended the residency application be accepted to the government's Immigration Committee, an advisory body that advises the Minister of Immigration on decisions on refugee claims. The advisory committee rejected the application. Its decision was forwarded to the Immigration Minister, who then rejected it. Now, a frustrated refugee advocate is warning Mr. Johnson that people who have been in Canada for a decade will miss out on permanent residency for fear of being targeted by authorities. Shameem Kimra, a former RCMP officer who has been guiding asylum seekers through the process since 2009, said the government has made it clear to him that it wants Syrian refugees to apply for permanent residency under the sponsorship of a Canadian citizen or permanent resident. He feels Mr. Johnson's move is a back-door decision made after the government was hit by widespread criticism after the Quebec shooting. A spokesman for Citizenship and Immigration Minister Chris Alexander said the government will decide on the next step after the Immigration Committee makes its recommendations to the Immigration Minister. "I will be mindful of the concerns raised by the immigration committee when making my decisions, but must also ensure that Canada continues to be a welcoming and generous country," said Maryse Renaud in an e-mail. Story continues below advertisement Mr. Kimra took a high-profile refugee who had been in Canada for three years. A controversial partnership between

Citizenship and Immigration Canada and the RCMP was underway to infiltrate 648931e174
