
Fifa 22

In a behind-the-scenes video from EA Sports, the FIFA development team explained that “HyperMotion Technology” is now used in all football titles produced by EA Sports. This week’s video explains how the technology works, how it was designed and why it was created in the first place. “Customers wanted a faster, more realistic football game,” said the game’s creative director Matt Prior. “Customers are very tired of beating the same realistic looking man-shaped boxes into submission.

With Modern Warfare 2, we made the system that created football players and balls so it could be used in other games. With FIFA, we’ve continued that effort and now it is spread across all of the FIFA games.” With some of the more realistic or detailed animations and complex A.I. systems, Codemasters is doubling down with the Be A Pro series of games. The first game of the series, Be A Pro Soccer 2010, was the first football title to be released on the Xbox 360. The game represented an entire campaign to capture the heart of the football fanatic and showed the level of detail in the game, as well as the development team’s dedication to producing realistic football gameplay. When Be A Pro Soccer 2 was announced last year, there was a massive hope that the next game would be even more realistic. “If you are a football fan, this is the game you want to play,” said Sam Collins, the group creative director for Be A Pro. “Our main goal in designing this game is to have fans of the sport enjoy the experience of being a professional footballer. Players will have to contend with a host of scenarios on the pitch, not the least of which is how to get the ball to the opposition’s goal.” Be A Pro Soccer 2 doesn’t rest on the laurels of Be A Pro Soccer 2010, as Collins explained, “It’s on a completely different platform, so we’ve got all kinds of new features and infrastructure on our back and on top of that we’ve got a brand new engine. Our world is created in partnership with Squash, the leading name in the field of tennis. We've applied all the things we've learnt from creating our football engine and all the things we know about the sport itself to create an experience that will not only be the most authentic football game on the market
