Even though Riddle was frustrated that the Hogwarts teachers had not been able to find the Room of Requirement, and still doubting that he himself had found it, he then remembered something that was in the Department of Mysteries' archives that they may have never thought of: the diadem was the first of Voldemort's Horcruxes. He then dusted off an obsolete textbook on Horcruxes that described diadems as the best form of protection for a magical object. Riddle realized that the artifact was what had given him such a powerful advantage over Dumbledore, and decided to use the diadem as his next Horcrux. All he needed was a body to place it in. [1] Riddle then manipulated the three schoolchildren into having their blood forcibly drawn by Snape. In his youth, Riddle had not been able to inflict painful injuries on Dumbledore and his allies, but eventually grew stronger as a result of the Dementor's Kiss. With the three children's blood in him, Riddle constructed a rudimentary body for the diadem. He then attempted to protect the diadem by casting a spell on its case. During this time, Riddle was mesmerized by the diadem and listened in fascination as Voldemort's earlier words came back to him. Finally believing that he had created the most perfect Horcrux, he placed the diadem on the first body that was born. [1] work against evil and magic alike, and were strong enough to protect the diadem from Severus Snape's attack in Book 6."

These charms
