are the results right? well, they generally are, but not in all cases. its certainly not foolproof. there are plenty of articles on the web (hundreds) explaining the difference between ios and vlfs (and how they are different), and when they are good or bad.

suffice to say that your customers performance could be much better than it is. when we see people that have no clue that there are other more useful things we can do with our storage, and that it doesnt make sense to sql server to make requests to the same location over and over again (all the time), we know their io is not good. think about it: if your disk is so badly fragmented, how do you expect an sql server to perform well? if you have this disk, you really need to try to figure out what its fragmentation is, get it sorted out, and then run the tests again. did your disk do better after clean up? if so, it doesnt sound like you have fragmentation, and thats good. if not, then thats a problem. if the disk did not improve at all, its more likely a severely fragmented disk, and theres no amount of clearing that will fix that. sorry to be so blunt. we are running sql server 2012 standard edition, which comes with enterprise edition as a default. we are not running any of the other "intensive" editions. the version of sql server is 11.x though, which runs as well as there is for the latest sql server versions, and we run sql server from 2008 r2 through 2014 well, the simple answer is, that there are a few good things that can be done, and a few bad things. the good things are: storage smaller than the os itself, massive ios on large platters, less overhead than modern disk controllers, and a database log file that is sized to fit the memory available to sql server, but then again, the bad things include massive fragmentation, lots of small files, not enough contiguous free space, and lots of locks that are difficult for sql server to take. if you have things that do one or more of these, and you want to use a single disk for sql server performance, then its probably not a good idea to add such performance-harming things as a raid-10, or stripe-size-optimized 8kb pages. we really like to keep the nasty stuff off the performance-critical server, which is why we have its own 4x500gb raid-10, and then take a drop of ssds to layer in another "sweet spot" that is not a performance-critical server at all. its a 2u mid-ranged machine with a sql server, and it gets 20-30% of the application's io. its like, our little quiet, not-so-very-high performance server. nice. and it handles all of our databases (30ish), plus the some background stuff like our backup services, replication, and so on. 5ec8ef588b
